Introduction

The hospital was built in 1873 by Samuel F. Lee as a place for himself and his family to live. By 1913 the Lee family had moved out. The county then decided to turn the Lee residence into a home for the elderly who need special care and supervision. It was named by the locals as "County Poor House" and was eventually considered to become a hospital. However, it wasn't until 1953 before it became "The New Tooele Hospital". Minor adjustments were made to ensure medical care could be provided to the patients that visited for care. The hospital was seen by the locals as a much more attractive hospital than the old Tooele hospital as the old hospital had no individual restrooms. Unfortunately, there was no location identified as a morgue, so the hospital designated a room for the dead. There could be long periods of time where the dead could stack up as it was on time permitting for the local mortuary to pick them up. Eventually Tooele built a state-of-the-art hospital, and the hospital was closed in 2000. Shortly after its closure the building was converted to a centre for the elderly.

Findings

The investigation into this case was somewhat hindered by the fact that many investigations have taken place here and numerous amounts of evidence were presented. It was due to this that the bureau did not warrant physical investigations to take place to save on resources.

The evidence already within the public domain does show that there is some evidence of activity that cannot be scientifically explained. Research into this included the location itself, the structure and safety of the building, weather reports at the time of investigations by other groups and the local wildlife which were all taken into consideration.

It is however of the belief that some aspects can be explained. Noises can be identified to structure, weather and wildlife. Apparitions however cannot be scientifically explained and therefore must come under the term of paranormal.

Recommendations

Overall, the recommendations that were made from this report were that of no further investigation is warranted.

Conclusion

To conclude this report, the findings show that the evidence presented is that of conclusive enough that no further investigation is warranted. There is already a lot of information and evidence within the public domain rendering a physical investigation from the bureau needless.
