Introduction

The Vampire Tree has been a story told for generations, but many locals in this area say it's more than just an urban legend...It happened. Since 1880 a majestic tree in the centre of Belen Cemetery is said to be the tomb of a Vampire that killed some locals.

Findings

The vampire tree is a creepy Mexican legend about a huge tree that grows out of a grave in a old cemetery in Guadalajara Mexico. The cemetery is in the middle of the city El Panteon De Belen. According to legend many years ago the citizens of Guadalajara was stalked by a blood thirsty vampire. The first sign of something being off was when they started finding dead animals all over the town, and when they examined the bodies, they discovered that the bodies was completely drained of blood. Then soon after newborn babies started getting attacked and their blood was completely drained from their bodies as well just like the animals. It was clean to the town that there was a blood thirsty vampire on the loose. Everyone in the town was terrified of leaving their homes after nightfall, there was a group of citizens who got tired of living in fear of the vampire they decided to put a end to it and find the vampire. In the dark, early morning hours another vampire attack was reported. The citizens was on alert and even seen a man sulking back to his home with light coloured eyes and pale white skin. The citizens blamed him and busted into his house killed him by driving a wooden stake into his heart, the next morning they dragged his body to the cemetery and buried him and put concrete over the grave hoping to prevent him from retuning. They returned months later and saw the concrete was broken and a small tree was growing over it. Over time the tree became huge and the locals named it the vampire tree. The tree stands still today, and locals say that if you break of a branch instead of sap blood will fall from it, and you can see the faces of the victims in the tree. The government put a fence around the tree to protect it cause legends says if the tree dies the vampire will return and terrorize the town and its citizens once again.
