Introduction

April 10th 2020

A patrolman named Alfonso and 3 other officers responded to a call in the Barrio Nuevo part of the town of Coita in the Mexican state of Chiapas. For days locals and many others in surrounding towns reported strange howling noises and sightings of a strange creature. This is the first time police actually sent men to investigate. Patrolman Alfonso said, he and his three colleagues also saw a man with wolf-like features standing two meters tall. The officers saw the creature jump a 2-meter-high fence in a single leap and also reported seeing it walk on rooftops. The small town had been terrorized for well over a week, and many locals had seen two or three of these creatures together. Some believed that the strange wolf-man beings came out of hiding from a nearby forest surrounding Meyapac Mountain, an area designated as a protected ecological zone in 2016. Some people in the town believe the creatures started to come into populated places because of increasing incursions into these local forested areas which, although protected by the government, were hassled by illegal farming and squatters. A few people thought that these werewolves were not real creatures but were rather forest spirits who were disturbed by the humans. Locals also say these creatures date back to the time of the Aztecs. People are very worried they have been hit hard by the pandemic, now worrying about werewolves is a major cause for alarm. Locals and police are stumped and still have not been able to come to a conclusion on this case.

Eyewitness posts what he saw on social media:

The masked Goodman sent off some other tweets elaborating on the situation. The creatures one night went on a rampage in Coita and the surrounding area. He wrote:

“There are three areas that are quite damaged but Villa de Allende more. Surely, due to the decrease in mobility and habitat, it (the werewolf) has approached the urban area. Villa de Allende was declared a Restricted Forest Zone in 1938 by (Mexican President) Lázaro Cárdenas. Today its legal status is uncertain.”
